Support Groups – Community Resource List

WHAT IS A SUPPORT GROUP?

There seems to be a support group for almost every condition or circumstance known. But what do they do? In general, groups may fall into one of three categories: mutual self-help, therapeutic, and social. Each has a slightly different focus, so you may find it helpful to have an idea of what kind of group you are looking for, or you may want to consider exploring two or more groups to meet different needs.

Mutual self-help groups exist to provide emotional support and practical help in coping with a problem that is shared by all the members. To be able to share one’s feelings with others who “have been there” can be quite helpful; one’s emotional burdens can be shared and no longer carried alone. While self-help groups may have a facilitator, it is not common for that person to be formally trained in counseling and group processes.

Therapeutic groups are usually led by mental health professionals; a social worker, a trained counselor, or a psychologist or psychiatrist. These groups are usually time-limited (6 to 8 weeks), may have an education component, and try to keep the group size to no more than eight to twelve people.

Re-socialization is an important need, and another reason people come together. Often times, a surviving spouse may find previous social contacts painful or unsatisfying, or may not quite know how to make new social contacts. Remember, a social group made up of people who once experienced the trauma of the loss of a spouse will differ considerably from a support group for the newly bereaved.

The groups listed on the following pages address a wide range of grief and loss issues from a variety of community resources. However, it is impossible to list every group, and contact persons frequently change. You may wish to check your church, synagogue, or worship community.
